This sentence is confusing, I didn't understand what you were trying to say until the orange highlighted sentence. "Personal figures" is ambiguous and I don't

I assume you're asking whether historians should look more at the diversity of male settlement house workers instead of reverting to stereotypes, but that's a little muddled in the phrasing.

This seems overly vague and doesn't directly address the questions you just asked. If the chapter as a whole focuses on the diversity of male settlement house workers that don't fit our preconceived notions of them, you should explicitly say that. If the chapter is broader than that, you should tease that before this sentence.

After reading the next few paragraphs, I would just cut this sentence. It doesn't add much and the one I highlighted in blue does a much better job of explaining your overall argument

My vote is to put this paragraph before your questions in the previous paragraph, while being careful to avoid repetition. I think it'd be better to explain the differences between Twose and the "stereotypical" male reformer before you give your research questions related to that diversity.

This is a really good paragraph overall of explaining your argument for the chapter one of the big things I had to clean up in my dissertation was the use of ambiguous pronouns like this. Be really careful that it's easy to figure out who you're talking about

I also think this is too vague and doesn't get at what, at least from the rest of this intro, is the meat of your chapter: the diversity of beliefs and ambitions of
